Firstly, how intermediality helps to uncover layers of the Italian imperial enterprise in East Africa and its consequences on the present, and secondly, how intermediality contributes both to the field of postcolonial studies and to the understanding of the current migration experience. While working to publish her doctoral thesis, Giulia has recently published a blog post titled 'Transmedial Storyworlds and the Struggle against Italian Colonial Amnesia' on the website of the AHRC-funded project 'Interdisciplinary Italy'.

Liliana Cavani began working as a freelance director for the state television network RAI, during the early 1960s. Her first major assignment was a series of historical documentaries, which include Storia del Terzo Reich (History of the Third Reich) (1961-1962), La donna nella resistenza (The Women of the Resistance) (1965), and Philippe Pétain: Processo a Vichy (Trial at Vichy) (1965). Her first feature film, Francesco di Assisi (1966) was acclaimed as the most controversial film of the year. This film gives striking evidence of Cavani's stylistic techniques and also serves as an ideal transition from the documentary films to Galileo (1968), I cannibali (The Cannibals), (1969), and Milarepa (1973), whose protagonists transgress the boundaries of conventional society in their quest for self-realization. This tendency to entertain new experiences, to represent a mode of imaginative behavior that explores the limits of cultural conventions is fully displayed in the films of the German trilogy: Il portiere di notte (The Night Porter) (1974), Al di là del bene e del male (Beyond Good and Evil) (1977), Interno berlinese (The Berlin Affair) (1985), or in La pelle (The Skin) (1980) and Ripley's Game (2002). Cavani has also directed several operas (Verdi, Puccini, Mascagni, Gluck, Berg) and plays (Pirandello, Eduardo De Filippo). Her most recent film L'ordine del tempo (The Order of Time) (2003), inspired by the book by theoretical physicist Carlo Rovelli, premiered at the 80th International Venice Film Festival where Cavani was awarded a Lifetime Achievement Golden Lion.
